About the Music

Mozart composed Symphonies 39, 40, and 41 in a six-month period in 1788, three years before his death. His final symphony was posthumously named Jupiter after the king of the gods, or the giant planet. This designation seems appropriate considering the scope of the work, stretching boundaries and in some opinions foreshadowing that of Beethoven.

This arrangement uses four of the five themes that Mozart used in the Finale, and beyond presenting these themes, retains the sonata-form configuration and includes some of the contrapuntal textures for which the work is so well known. Care should be taken to adhere to the light articulations of the Classical style within the musical declarations of greatness and grandness. The repeat of the exposition is at the discretion of the conductor.
